FBI Spy Betrays U.S. Top Secret Tracking Device to bin-Laden

Osama bin-Laden has obtained America's most secret tracking device from America's pro-muslim FBI .

The software was stolen by Robert Hanssen, the FBI officer who "compromised an entire technical program of enormous value, expense and importance." The modern FBI is riddled with enemy agents of influence, moles and subversive American traitors.

Hanssen, who had spied for Russia since 1985 until his arrest has now told his FBI /CIA interrogation team that a copy of the software was sold-on to bin-Laden late for "over two million U.S. dollars" by his KGB controllers. There is more to the story but the FBI is keeping it secret because that corrupt agency is trying to prevent full knowledge of its total subversion.

The pirated software was originally developed for the FBI and other US intelligence agencies by the Washington company, Inslaw, under the brand name of Promis. Hanssen supervised its installation into the FBI headquarters.

Hanssen, who was then head of FBI counter-intelligence, was the agency's acknowledged computer expert. The FBI only recently admitted that Hanssen told his interrogators in Washington that with the software, bin-Laden could track any attempt by Western intelligence agencies to locate him. At the same time he could also have the software programmed to keep tabs on any target of his choice.

"The core of the software is its simplicity. It requires the minimum of computer knowledge. It is all built into the software disc and is designed to be operated from a simple laptop - the kind on sale in any street," said Ari Ben-Menashe, the former Israeli government expert on counter terrorism.

A copy of the software is now believed to be in one of bin-Laden's redoubts in Afghanistan. Another copy is said by CIA sources to be in Sudan. Other copies are scattered worldwide.

The CIA has sent Britain's MI 6 a "red alert" that the software could be used to track and mount a strike against British targets. Western intelligence agencies are also urgently investigating reports that bin-Laden may have made contact with the Marxist IRA faction, who are said to be looking for another "big name" target to strike against after the leftist BBC. The fact that US intelligence agencies would emphasize such a low priority threat as the BBC is further evidence of both their incompetence and subverted nature.

Using the Promis software, it would be possible for any terrorist group to have vital prior knowledge of how and where to reach a target.

Bin-Laden, labeled by the United States "the world's most wanted terrorist" is a wealthy Saudi billionaire who is one leader of muslim imperialism that has declared war on both Western Civilization and Christianity, thereby precipitating World War IV. (A war that America's leftist government refuses to acknowledge.) Bill Hamilton, President of Inslaw, said that "... Promis software, it could allow (Bin Laden) to carry out the kind of terror attack that would be almost unstoppable."
