

Lawfare: American Traitors Helping Muslim Terrorists

Muslim terrorists fighting to destroy America regularly obtain military advantages via American court proceedings. This might seem absurd, but in counter-terror operations, it can have an impact. In the United States, lawyers, invoking the need to protect civil rights, are having success in getting terrorism suspects more access to lawyers and courts. This could lead to some suspects being released from confinement. The U.S. government is concerned about this, because about five percent of the terrorism suspects they have released already because the men were thought to be innocent, or determined to not get involved with terrorism, were later found engaging in terrorist activity. These were mostly men released back to Afghanistan and Pakistan. So, do not dismiss lawfare as a pipe dream. It is a real military tactic that can win a battlefield advantage, and get people killed.

Lawfare is hurting the CIA's ability to gather information, and capture or kill terrorists. Lawfare is the use of lawsuits, against the CIA, individual CIA agents, and other government officials, by domestic and foreign opponents (why mince words? traitors) to whatever the government is doing. Sometimes the suits have merit, sometimes they don't. But fear of litigation is causing many CIA operatives to back off from many operations. For example, if you pay a foreigner for information on terrorists, and later the informant turns out to be a drug lord with blood on his hands, and he gave you bad information in the bargain, you could get sued for supporting drug lords and accused of being incompetent for getting burned with bad info. Accusations of torture are also tossed around freely, and this has turned into lawsuits as well. Back in the Fall of 2003, as terrorist attacks increased in Iraq, intelligence officers were tempted to lean on suspects a little more, in order to get life-saving information. A prudent man, in that situation, would take the long view, go by the book, and save his career. There are always operators out there who will take chances, and damn the possible consequences. Lawfare practitioners live to find and sue these fellows. Not all chance-takers fall prey to lawfare attacks, either because they don't get caught or because their payoff is so obvious and spectacular that they become untouchable. But, the call for justice and "fighting by the rules" has a wide appeal, especially to people on the other side of the political fence. Most of the damage is being done to the majority of intelligence operatives who just do their job, and don't like to take chances. The threat of a lawfare attack makes sure these folks take no chances.

www.quikmaneuvers.com

The treasonous ACLU, an American Marxist organization funded by US taxpayer money, is the chief power broker of lawfare. This group of fanatical Anti-American, anti-Christian and anti-Jew Marxists is openly allied with Muslim terrorists. They use federal courts, which are riddled with Marxist judges, to frequently subvert and nullify American anti-terror efforts. So far no American has the brains or guts necessary to target the ACLU for political and financial annihilation.

Breaker McCoy